The NTHU Institute of Linguistics has been recognized as having one of the most distinguished linguistics programs in Taiwan in theoretical linguistics as well as in the fields of Chinese and Austronesian linguistics. The Institute was founded in 1986, with the launching of the M.A. program. We established a Ph.D. program in 1990, and in 2004, we added a Ph.D. specialization in Austronesian linguistics, in collaboration with the Institute of Linguistics at Academia Sinica. The NTHU Institute of Linguistics aims to give students well-rounded training in linguistics, with equal emphases on theory and practice.

Attention is also given to interdisciplinary research, so that students can gain a solid foundation in humanities and natural sciences as well as in linguistics. To better prepare students for graduate studies in linguistics, an undergraduate linguistics program was begun in 2002 through the NTHU Department of Humanities and Social Sciences. In 2006, an M.A. program in Taiwan Studies was jointly launched by the NTHU Institutes of Anthropology, Linguistics, and Taiwanese Literature. This program is designed so that current elementary and middle school teachers can get graduate-level training in linguistics.

講者 : Tue Trinh (University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee)

題目 : In defense of structural alternatives

日期 : 2018年1月5日 (星期五)

時間 : 中午12時30分 開始

地點 : 人社院 B305研討室

摘要 : It has been observed that implicatures licensed by (the utterance of) a sentence S depend not only on the meaning of S but also on its syntactic structure. This phenomenon motivates the "grammatical approach" to implicatures which take these to be entailments deduced from compositional semantics, not pragmatic inferences drawn from reasoning about the speaker's belief. The approach presupposes a notion of "alternatives," sentences which could have been used instead of the one that was used, that are distinctly formal: alternatives of S must be syntactically related to S. This talk explores what that relation is. I will present some facts which pose a challenge for recent theories of alternatives, and provide an account for them in the spirit of the grammatical approach to implicatures.
